

A
A
0
0
0
3
6
4
5
3
8
9

SONGS

OF A PARISH PRIEST.

BY
Rev. Basil Edwards.

THE LIBRARY
OF
THE UNIVERSITY
OF CALIFORNIA
LOS ANGELES

Digitized by the Internet Archive in 2008 with funding from Microsoft Corporation

Alfred B. S. Welch
19. 2. 89.

SONGS
OF A PARISH PRIEST.

SONGS
OF
A PARISH PRIEST.

BY
REV. BASIL EDWARDS, M.A.,

*Late of Gonville and Caius College, Cambridge ;
Rector of Blaisdon,
Newnham-on-Severn, Gloucestershire.*

GEORGE ALLEN,
SUNNYSIDE, ORPINGTON, KENT.
1888.

PR

4649

E254a

To

ALEXANDER MACKAY, Esq., J.P.,

HOLT MANOR, WILTS,

FOR WHOM

ALL THE SACRED ASSOCIATIONS WHICH CLUSTER ROUND

A PARISH CHURCH

ARE, AS THE WRITER KNOWS, FULL OF INTEREST,

THESE

"SONGS OF A PARISH PRIEST"

ARE AFFECTIONATELY DEDICATED,

AS A VERY SLIGHT TOKEN OF A VERY DEEP REGARD.

917911

PREFACE.

THAT beautiful, but to many, little-known, prayer called the "Bidding Prayer," invites our suffrages for Christ's Holy Catholic Church, and especially for that pure and Apostolic branch of it established in these realms. It has seemed to the writer of this little book, that in every parish and every country village there are, besides the living voice of the Church, numberless silent witnesses which appeal to her sons' and daughters' hearts; and that all the associations, even of the material things which form part of and surround the "houses of God in the land," are intensely sacred, and are full of teaching.

The quiet of a country charge has enabled the writer to endeavour to link together many of the objects most prominently connected with sacred thought in a rural parish, and to present the results to the reader in somewhat of a sequence, leading step by step from the Lych Gate to the Altar. If this endeavour serves at all to deepen the love of sacred things in the hearts of any of the sons and daughters of the Church, he will be more than repaid.

CONTENTS.

	PAGE
PREFACE	v

PART I.

THE VILLAGE CROSS	i
THE VILLAGE SCHOOL	3
THE LYCH GATE	5
THE SATURDAY OF FLOWERS	7
THE CLOCK	9
THE VANE	11
THE BELLS	13
THE VESTRY	15
THE PORCH	17
THE FONT	19
THE FALD-STOOL	20
THE LECTERN	22
THE PULPIT	24
THE ORGAN	26
THE ALTAR	28
THE CROSS	30
THE ALTAR LIGHTS	32
THE PATEN	34
THE CHALICE	36
THE CHALICE VEIL	38

	PAGE
THE HOLY COMMUNION	40
THE COMMUNION OF THE SICK	42
THE ALMS DISH	44
A FLOWER SERVICE	46
MINISTERING SPIRITS	48
SILENT VOICES	50
THE RECTORY	52
THE OLD PATHS	54
OUR MOTHER CHURCH OF ENGLAND	56
BATTLE MUSIC	58
AT THE THRESHOLD	61
WHILE THE EMBERS GLOW	63
DOMUM, DULCE DOMUM !	65
INTERCESSION	67
SHADOWS ON THE WALL	69
ALTA QUIES	72
ANASTASIS	74
THROUGH THE RIFTS	76
THE TWO SPOTS	77
COMFORT	80
PRESSING TOWARD THE MARK	82
SOON	84
THE OTHER SIDE	87
" DE PROFUNDIS "	90
THE LAND BEYOND THE SEA	92
THE VIGIL	94
SHADOW-LAND	96
EVENTIDE	98
REUNION	100
THE MORNING WATCH	102

PART II.

	PAGE
THE RIGHI SUNSET	107
THE NAME IN SAND	109
THE BROKEN FLOWER	111
LITTLE EVELYN	113
A MOTHER'S ARMS	115
MARY'S VOYAGE	117
FLOWERS AMID THE CORN	119
LUX E TENEBRIS	121
THE EVERLASTING SHORE	123
A CHILD'S MATINS	125
A CHILD'S EVENSONG	127
NEW YEAR'S MORNING	129
DIVERS PATHS	131
PAX DEI	133
COMPASSION	135
RAYS	137
BEHIND THE VEIL	140

PART I.

THE VILLAGE CROSS.

IN the centre of the village,
Where the well-worn roadways meet,
And the shadows from the sunset
Fall slanting o'er the street,
Among the passing people,
With their ceaseless ebb and flow,
Still rise the ancient stones which bore
The cross in years ago.

The steps are cut in sevens,
They are smooth and worn with age,
The relics of a far off time
Writ in an elder page.
And here in careless gladness
The village children play
Where their forefathers' fathers
Were wont to kneel and pray.

Here, in the westering sunlight,
Beneath the sacred rood,
In days now long departed,
The wandering friar has stood,
With arms and voice uplifted,
To tell of Mary's Son,
Through whose dear cross and passion
The whole wide world was won.

The burgher from the city,
The franklin from the grange,
The palmer back from travel
In countries far and strange,
With village hinds would gather,
While tears would sometimes rise,
And gentle looks come softly
To unaccustomed eyes.

Here, when the waves of battle
Had broken all in blood,
The flying and the dying
Would cling around the rood ;
The bitter sword of vengeance
Would turn its edge aside,
And brother bend with brother
Before the "Crucified."

Like some high tower at midnight,
From which there streams the ray
That cheers and guides the toilers
O'er ocean's storm-tossed way ;
So, 'midst the lurid darkness
Of those red feudal skies,
The one great Church was pointing
The path to Paradise.

And still these stones are standing
In witness of the past,
With mute appeal to heaven,
Though skies be overcast.
They tell our children's children,
'Mid earthly gain or loss,
How their forefathers' fathers
Built up the village cross.

THE SCHOOL.

WHEN the clock is striking twelve,
 Before the last note dies,
 How merry are the children,
 With happy, eager eyes !

And clatter go their footsteps
 Adown the village street ;
 Ah ! well if in the years to come
 Life might be found as sweet !

And chatter go their voices,
 The tones arise and fall—
 But yet the melody of life
 Is rippling thro' them all.

Oh, happy burst of laughter,
 Amid the leafy lanes !
 Oh, ringing mirth that eddies round
 The latticed window-panes !

Oh, dear unsullied gladness !
 Oh, eyes so innocent !
 Ye surely have not dreamed as yet
 What sin and sorrow meant.

The fresh, fair sunlight glances
On each unruffled brow;
O that the stress and strain of life
Might leave you pure as now!

THE LYCH-GATE.

AT the entrance of the Churchyard,
 Where the graves are green and fair,
 The old lych gateway standeth
 Above the low mounds there.
 A good old oaken gateway,
 Where the priest receives the dead
 When first the mourners' footsteps
 Pause in their solemn tread.

On one side lies the trampling
 And the noise of the village street,
 But within is the holy quiet
 Of a hushed and calm retreat,
 Where the very air is clearer,
 And the deep, deep sky more blue ;
 For the doors of heaven seem nearer,
 As if God were coming through.

Beneath that gabled archway,
 While bells ring soft and clear,
 The happy congregations
 Have passed for many a year.
 Yet sometimes there in silence
 The eyes of love run o'er,
 As some are borne beneath it
 Who come back nevermore.

Yet hence, in youthful gladness,
The bridegroom leads the bride,
The while the village children
Gaze on them sunny-eyed.
And words of kindest greeting
Full many a time are said,
As friend with friend is meeting
Beneath the Lych-gate's shade.

The path that winds beneath it
Is bordered with the sod,
And echoed once with footsteps
That rest them now with God.
Age after age is travelling
Along that sacred way,
And where we tread, our fathers
Were passing yesterday.

And thus that old lych gateway
Is witness day by day
When we pass into the churchyard
To muse awhile and pray
That in God's gracious keeping
We too may close our eyes,
And pass beyond its portals
To sunny Paradise.

THE SATURDAY OF FLOWERS.

"DYDD SADWRN Y BLODAN."

I LOVE that old Welsh custom,
 "The Saturday of Flowers,"
 Which renders to the hallowed dead
 A few regretful hours.
 Before the bells of Easter
 Are throbbing on the air,
 Our steps are drawn to holy ground,
 And those who slumber there.

'Twas in Saint Joseph's garden
 They laid Our Lord to rest,
 And meetly 'neath the stainless flowers
 His people slumber best.
 With God's free winds around them,
 And the soft blue skies above,
 While our tender thoughts surround them
 E'en in their graves with love.

Each mound is like a garden :
 In clusters here and there,
 The simple-hearted country folk
 Their treasured offerings bear.
 They have wreaths of pure, pale primrose,
 The emblem meet of rest,
 And crosses of Lent lilies
 To lie upon the breast.

They pass in silence, softly,
Among the quiet dead,
The village children, sunny-eyed,
With gentle, reverent tread.
And the father trims the hillock,
While the mother, near the spot,
Is bending o'er the bright fresh tufts
Of blue "forget-me-not."

There are miners from the "Forest,"
Stained with the rich red ore,
And fisher-folk from far away
Beside the Severn shore.
The "fathers of the hamlet"
Lie 'neath the sacred sod.
They dress the graves, and pause awhile,
To think of them—and God.

The parish priest among them
In quiet converse walks,
And, mingling with the changing groups,
In kindly wise he talks.
His words are to the living,
Then of the dead, anon,—
Full well of those who slumber there
He mindeth many a one.

Then, as the soft spring sunset
Fades on the time-worn towers,
The hues of evening gather round
The Saturday of Flowers,
All in God's gracious keeping
We leave the dead to rest,
With the crosses of Lent lilies
That lie upon the breast.

THE CLOCK.

THE dial on the good grey tower
 Meteth Time's fleeting measure ;
 The halves, the quarters, and the hour,
 Or bring they pain or pleasure.

The gilded hands before the face,
 In gladness or affliction,
 Like sainted fingers fraught with grace,
 Uplift their benediction.

To some its flying moments flit,
 Touched with a tinge of glory,
 To others as they muse on it
 Life shows a sombre story.

Of all the faces far and near,
 While Time swings onward slowly ;
 The features, be they loved or dear,
 Yet change in part or wholly.

But yet that well-known face ere now
 Unlined by care or sadness,
 Has looked upon the old man's brow
 And on his infant gladness,

Like one whose ever-watchful eye
 "Nor slumbereth nor sleepeth,"
This old-world dial placed on high
 Its solemn vigil keepeth.

The notes are borne in eddying sighs,
 When the red sun is setting,
And witness as the daylight dies,
 In spite of our forgetting.

And some day, when those silver chimes
 On other ears are falling,
And we and all our earthly times
 Are passed beyond recalling,

Then in the clearer light that streams
 Where nought of Time can sever,
May we arise from mists and dreams
 To have a part for ever!

THE VANE.

O SLENDER cross that soarest high
 Towards the thunderous skies,
 The while the rolling clouds go by,
 In which the lightning lies ;
 The tempest rocks thee, far-off rood,
 Thou bravest all the winds of God.

From sunlit East the breeze may blow,
 From South or icy North,
 Or sweep across the Western seas,
 With wild tempestuous wrath.
 But yet, whate'er the wind that blows,
 The cross nor change nor danger knows.

O blessèd sign, beheld afar,
 Whene'er the day grows old,
 Athwart yon clear horizon bar
 A living gleam of gold ;
 In witness, as the daylight dies,
 That yonder there are fadeless skies.

Thy shadow falls on holy ground,
 Across each rounded grave,
 While far beneath the gilded vane
 The giant elm trees wave,
 But soaring still thro' shine or mist,
 The village spire looks up to Christ.

Earth's mists lie brooding o'er the ground,
But as they rise they fade ;
The eye of faith can aye discern
The cross above the shade,
As though to teach us even here
The calm of that high atmosphere.

Thus reaching thro' the clouds of earth,
As time is hurrying by,
Christ's Holy Church uplifts her face
To far eternity ;
And though the mists may lie below,
God's awful light is on her brow.

Amid the tumult and the storm
Of worldly gain or loss,
Although the tempests rage and swell,
She lifts His steadfast cross,
Until shall dawn that longed-for day
When all the shadows flee away.

THE BELLS.

O HOLY Bells ! O happy Bells !
 How clear your music floats,
 As though the tones that wander by
 Had caught some angel notes !

In smiling country far away,
 Or by the salt sea foam,
 Ye fall like songs of Paradise,
 O hallowed Bells of home !

I see once more the good grey tower
 Stand stately 'mid the trees,
 And hear for one short sacred hour
 The chimes upon the breeze.

The joy bells on a Christmas morn ;
 The peal on Easter Day ;
 The silver voice that, morn by morn,
 Calls " two or three " to pray.

The notes that throb upon the air,
 With echoes far and wide,
 As down the churchyard green and fair
 The bridegroom leads the bride.

Or when away amid the hills
Rings out the plaintive knell;
As through each rugged bosom thrills
Thy note, O passing bell!

The labourer stays his sunburnt hand
To hear the great bell toll;
A neighbour nears the silent land,—
“God speed the passing soul.”

And through the hamlet far away,
With measured beat and dread,
The knell from yonder steeple grey
Goes sounding for the dead.

And some day, when those changing chimes
Are throbbing thro' the air,
And fill men's ears in aftertimes,
Though we shall not be there,

All in a country far away,
Beyond the salt sea foam,
O that we hear in Paradise
The blessèd notes of Home!

THE VESTRY.

A PEACEFUL chamber, hushed and calm,
Where tempered light serenely falls,
And sound floats softly like a psalm
That dies at eve in holy walls.

A presence fills the shadowy room,
A fragrance breathes upon the air,
As though there lingered in the gloom
The incense of a good man's prayer.

There many a bride, with winsome grace,
In which a guileless heart bore sway,
Has looked upon her true love's face
And signed her maiden name away.

And here are numbered lists which show
How, though the world is waxing old,
The cross still gleams on childhood's brow
And lambs are gathered to the fold.

While yonder clasps enclose the leaves
Which tell how surely, day by day,
The tireless reaper binds the sheaves
And bears the wheat and tares away.

And here the white-robed choristers
Raise reverent voices sweet and low ;
Till, as the deep-toned organ stirs,
They wend forth softly two and two.

Then, after "benediction" falls,
A moment's space they all draw nigh,
And pray within these peaceful walls,
Before they lay those white robes by.

And thus this hallowed chamber seems
A portal to Our Father's home ;
To which at length, beyond our dreams,
The footsteps of His children come,—

Where saints shall wear the robes of white
And never lay them more aside,
But gladdened by eternal light
The pure in heart are satisfied.

THE PORCH.

WHEN once within the harbour,
 Its sure protection gained,
 The storm-bound vessels anchor,
 Though every cord be strained.
 Although the foam is flying
 Beyond the surf-beat "bar,"
 The mariners are lying
 Where peace and safety are.

And thus those time-worn portals,
 That rise so calm and grey,
 Hold out to wistful mortals
 Their shelter day by day.
 Without may be the burden
 Of a life of pain and care,
 But within the calm and quiet
 Of Our Father's House of Prayer.

The happy village children
 Pass in with softened tread,
 The maiden and the matron,
 The hoary good grey head.
 Some think to enter often
 For years and years to come,
 And some, a few more footsteps
 They know will bring them home.

So through the vaulted archway
That leads to yonder door
Men pass alike as brothers,
And shall do evermore.
All in the same High Presence,
Within the same grey walls,
Kneel high-born men and lowly,
As Absolution falls.

And some day, when our footsteps
No longer tread this way,
Or seek those sacred portals
Through which they pass to-day,—
When other knees are bending,
And other voices rise,
Oh to have part unending
Of praise in Paradise!

THE FONT.

O ANCIENT stone where, one by one,
 Each village mother brings her child,
 To bathe beneath the cleansing flood,
 From whence she bears it undefiled !

The generations come and go,
 And heads of down are heads of grey ;
 While those who here were prayed for, come
 Themselves in turn to kneel and pray.

Wave after wave of mortal life
 Breaks round thee, O thou timeworn stone ;
 Wave after wave of strain and strife,
 But still the tide is rolling on.

The pleading priest, the white-robed choir,
 The locks with sacred waters wet,
 The infant chrisomvestured forms,
 The brows whereon the cross is set.

And still the ancient grace prevails,
 Although the world is waxing old,
 " By water and the word," and thus
 The lambs are gathered to the fold.

THE FALD-STOOL.

BETWEEN the porch and altar,
 Where the people kneel and pray,
 As you pass towards the chancel,
 The Fald-stool stands away.
 And there that intercession
 Which time the more endears
 Rolls on its pleading accents
 Through all the changing years.

The voices of our fathers
 Have swelled that tide of prayer,
 That mighty supplication
 Has softened many a care.
 And surely still those pleadings
 On yon eternal shore
 In waves of intercession
 Keep breaking evermore.

Oh, none so high and stately,
 Oh, none so mean and poor,
 But both alike are welcomed
 Within the church's door.
 The monarch in his splendour,
 The poor man wandering by,
 Alike have place and portion
 In that grand Litany.

As God's blue sky is bending
 Upon the far-off hills,
Or as the dew descending
 That feeds a thousand rills,
Or like the mighty ocean
 That washes every shore,
So here each heart's emotion
 Finds echo evermore.

O waves of intercession,
 O suffrages that rise
In lofty, long procession
 Towards eternal skies,
How tender are the memories
 Your holy voices bear,
In all the measured cadence
 Of this so matchless prayer!

Soft as a mother's accents,
 When for her child she pleads,
The voice of our true Mother,
 As thus she intercedes.
And thus her sons and daughters,
 As life is eddying by,
Pour out their hearts in worship
 And bless her Litany.

THE LECTERN.

WITHIN our village chancel,
 Inside the dark oak choir,
 Is a spot where the great east window
 Floods all the floor with fire,
 Where the gold and crimson glories
 Of its painted lights are thrown,
 As the shadows from the altar
 Lie floating on the stone.

There stands the wide-wing'd eagle,
 The symbol of Saint John ;
 Though some who were gathered round it
 Are into silence gone,
 Yet it stands with tireless pinions,
 As it bears God's word of grace,
 With an onward gaze and upward
 Upon its changeless face.

And, like some silver clarion,
 From where that lectern stands,
 Ring daily, softly, clearly,
 The notes of Christ's commands.
 The Sower's hand is sowing
 Whene'er he turns those leaves ;
 Oh that the last great harvest
 May show the whitening sheaves !

Here no caprice or passion
Can urge its changeful sway,
God's very words—they only—
Are set forth day by day.
Oh, wisdom of our fathers,
To give us daily bread,
As in the Church's order
Our Master's words are said !

Around that lectern gather,
While pass the fleeting years,
Eyes that are bright with gladness,
Some that are soft with tears ;
The light of children's faces,
Youth, with its open brow,
The earnest gaze of manhood,
The old man's crown of snow.

So on that spot for ever
God's message ringeth clear,
Though changing tones and voices
May bear it to the ear.
And one day, ah ! so surely,
Although the ages wane,
The bread cast on the waters
Shall all be found again.

THE PULPIT.

IT is but a village pulpit,
 It has stood where it stands for years,
 And footsteps that now are silent
 Have trodden those oaken stairs ;
 But at last they have reached a region
 Where the preacher's voice is hushed,
 Where stilled is all passionate pleading
 And the eloquent lips are dust.

It has rung with the soaring echoes
 Of a voice that is far away,
 And those panels have thrilled with the music
 Of a tongue that is turned to clay.
 But the thoughts which were brave and kindly,
 And the flash of the fearless eye,
 Like the love of the Christlike spirit,
 Are things that can hardly die.

It may be some words were homely,
 But they flowed from a true, brave heart,
 Which could throb with a brother's gladness
 Or ache with a sister's smart.
 If they knew not the pointless phrases
 Of a school that was Low or High,
 Yet they taught of a God Who loved us,
 And they branded a lie, a lie.

There's many a toilworn peasant,
When the work of the week is done,
Who will gaze at this old oak pulpit,
And sigh for a face that's gone,
For the voice that rang out like silver,
For the locks like the silver too,
For the eyes which were calm and kindly,
Which God's light was shining through.

It is but a village pulpit,
It has stood where it stands for years,
But some, as they gaze upon it,
See dimly through mists of tears,
As they long for the pleading music
Of a voice that is far away;
For the seed that was sown in weakness
Lives on in some hearts to-day.

THE ORGAN.

IN the placid depths of ocean
 Giant forces are at rest ;
 All the tumult of the tempest
 Underlies that peaceful breast.
 Storm and whirlwind, crested billow,
 Wreathen foam, all white and free,
 Mighty force that is resistless,
 Slumber in a summer sea.

So within these quiet portals
 What a storm of music floats,
 As the organ's thunder rolleth
 Upward with exultant notes ;
 While the great "Amen" goes throbbing
 Through the arches high and dim,
 Till the chords that rise so grandly
 Wander towards the seraphim !

Onwards, like a tide of glory,
 Waves of sound go rolling by,
 Clinging to the elerestory,
 Soaring to the songs on high ;
 Till the soul, awhile transfigured,
 Seemeth for a moment's space
 To have cast aside its raiment,
 And to touch some far-off place.

Soon this fleeting generation,
Where we play awhile our part,
Shall have swept into the silence
That shall hush each restless heart ;
But that high triumphant music
Through these vaulted aisles shall roll,
And each deep "Amen" resounding
Waken echoes in the soul.

When our barque has reached the haven,
Other ships shall sail the seas ;
When our feeble touch is silent,
Other fingers sweep the keys ;
When the wave has burst in splendour,
Other billows reach the shore :
Thus the round of laud and worship
Rolleth onwards evermore.

But within that region saintly,
Hidden from our eager eyes,
Which we scan in part and faintly,
Known to us as Paradise,
There are sweeter voices singing
Than we hear within the choir,
Fuller, richer notes are ringing,
Grander music, soaring higher.

When the organ's tones no longer
Fall upon our listening ears,
Or its mighty chords of passion
Thrill the kneeling worshippers,
May the trembling "vox humana"
Change into the "voix céleste,"
And the songs that know not sorrow
Be our loudest—grandest—best !

THE ALTAR.

SIX cities stood in Holy Land :
 Within their walls dwelt peace,
 The fierce avenger stayed his hand,
 The flying footsteps cease ;
 Nor sword, nor scaith, nor peril waits
 The fugitive within those gates.

And so, amidst the storms of life,
 One place alone is found
 Where reverent hearts and feet may press,
 And find it " Holy Ground " ;
 One spot on earth is free from care,—
 Thine altar, Lord, when Thou art there !

It may be but a village shrine,
 Where two or three may meet
 With Him, Whose tender love divine
 Would woo them to His feet ;
 But yet, what awe and rapture thrill
 The faithful few who worship still !

When, wrapped in deep adoring awe,
 The soul to God draws near,
 The mists of time are rolled away,
 The lights of heaven appear ;
 And e'en on earth, a moment's space,
 Our eyes are on " Our Father's " face.

The mystery of mysteries
Upon that altar lies ;
Bow down, O heart, bow down, O head !
But faith uplift thine eyes :
The very God is at thy side—
Thy gaze is on the Crucified !

And so, amidst our daily cares,
One harbour lies secure,
Where souls may anchor in the peace
Of God for evermore.
A shelter where awhile is given
To breathe on earth the air of heaven.

O one tremendous Sacrifice,
We plead Thee yet again ;
In life and in the days of health,
In death or mortal pain,
We still would keep Thy sacred tryst,
And meet Thee in Thy Eucharist.

THE CROSS.

"IN HOC SIGNO."

GLIDING through the shadows,
 Goes the cross of Christ,
 Through the dreary darkness,
 Through the driving mist.
 Lo ! the storms are rising ;
 Hark ! the winds are shrill ;
 But the cross is moving
 Onwards, onwards still.

Onwards, upwards, homewards
 Through the striving air,
 Press the streaming pennons
 Of that standard fair ;
 Tens and tens of thousands,
 Martyr, child, and maid,
 March beneath the shelter
 Of its sacred shade.

Round that waving banner,
 While the war goes on,
 Deeds of saintly daring
 Have been wrought and won.
 O for feet to follow !
 O for hands to fight !
 O for strength to wrestle
 Onwards into light !

Onwards where the battle
Fierce and fiercer grows,
Where the air is parted
With a thousand blows,
See the swords are flashing,
See the spears are wet,
But that lofty banner
Surgeth onwards yet.

Down the darksome valley
Streams that sacred sign,
'Midst the gloom and blackness
How its splendours shine !
Lighting yonder waters,
Swift and deep and chill,
As its rays are passing
Onwards, onwards still.

By Thy pangs and passion,
By Thy pain and loss,
Crucified, we cry Thee,
Draw us by that cross ;
By the wounds of pity,
By the nail-pierced hand,
Lead Thy pilgrim soldiers
Into Holy Land.

THE ALTAR LIGHTS.

TWIN lights upon the altar,
 O emblems meet and right,
 Ye speak of One whose radiance
 Gives all His people light ;
 The altar were ungarnished
 Without your sacred ray ;
 The Church's gold were tarnished
 If He were far away.

Like two clear lamps whose splendour
 Glows softly near and far,
 Your rays unite and witness
 The Bright and Morning Star ;
 They tell of One whose mercy
 Is linked with each behest,—
 “My presence shall go with thee,
 And I will give thee rest.”

There's light upon the altar,
 And light within the heart
 That, like the Holy Mary,
 Pursues the better part.
 And, as that sacred Presence
 Breathes like an air divine,
 In contrite hearts and humble
 It makes its wondrous shrine.

In many a vast cathedral
Your rays fall full and fair,
And flood the kneeling thousands,
While God Himself is there :
Or in some village chancel
The sacred sign is set,
Within the same high Presence,
Where "two or three are met."

And so ye deck our altars,
Though ages come and go,
The Church nor stoops nor falters,
But shines with steadfast glow,—
The guide to yonder city,
Upon the sinless shore,
Where light of earthly candle
Is needed nevermore.

THE PATEN.

O PATEN, smooth with use
 Of service years ago,
 A purer ray is thine to-day
 Than earthly splendours show !

No Cæsar's lofty seat,
 Or throne of emperor,
 Hath e'er been pressed by such a Guest
 As thou art wont to bear.

For hands that grasp the palm
 Have held thy living bread ;
 Around thee gleam, as in a dream,
 The shadowy featured dead.

Oh, what an atmosphere
 Of rapture and of prayer,
 In awe profound hath dwelt around
 The burden thou dost bear !

The generations pass,
 And day succeeds to day ;
 Tho' art is long, yet death is strong ;
 The river glides away.

But still the Cross retains
Its high unbending faith ;
Tho' ebb and flow lay kingdoms low
Yet life o'ercometh death.

The yearning souls of men
Are fed with heavenly food ;
'Mid pain and strife, they taste of life
Christ's Body and His Blood.

THE CHALICE.

I LIKE to think this slender rim,
 Which holds that crimson flow,
 Was pressed by our forefathers' lips
 Two hundred years ago,—

That while the world goes rolling by,
 In dull or fevered mood,
 The one true Church is nurtured on
 Christ's Body and His Blood.

And thus this cup, where tremble still—
 Those drops so dearly shed,
 Was often held by holy hands,
 Now folded with the dead ;

And lips that gently touched this rim
 Of silver worn and bright
 Are singing with the seraphim
 In everlasting light.

The wistful, reverent, yearning eyes,
 That fell before the rail,
 Have opened since in Paradise,
 And see beyond the veil.

While we are chanting in the choir,
Those sweeter voices raise
The soaring songs that wander far
Beyond our mortal praise.

But still those hearts that rest them now
In that serener air
Beat on in unison with ours,
That sometimes ache with care.

So well we love this chalice bright,
Our fathers pressed before ;
But oh, to drink the wine of God
On high for evermore !

THE CHALICE VEIL.

WHEN downwards from the Holy Mount
 The feet of Moses trod,
 There glowed upon his radiant brow
 The awful light of God ;
 And none of all the chosen race
 Could gaze into that shining face.

When o'er the outspread mercy seat
 The bright Shekinah shone,
 One footstep through the rolling year
 Might enter there alone,
 And pass unseen by mortal eye
 Beyond that veil of mystery.

Yet faith the same high Presence hails
 Within these courts to-day,
 Thy people at Thy altar rails
 (Ah, who so blest as they !)
 May kneel and keep Thy sacred tryst,
 And Thou art with them, Saviour-Christ.

And though a veil of spotless white
 Doth hide the heavenly food,
 And screen from man's too eager sight
 The Body and the Blood,
 Yet still where sense and sight must cease
 The soul can rest herself in peace,—

In perfect peace that questions not
Of either how or where,
But dwells in the stupendous truth
That Thou Thyself art there ;
And in the joy that knowledge brings
Is lost to sense of smaller things.

And some day, in God's perfect time,
Our last communion made,
That Presence, all revealed, shall shine
With rays that cannot fade,
And lighten that tremendous day
Which rends the veil of life away.

HOLY COMMUNION.

" I BELIEVE . . . IN THE COMMUNION OF SAINTS."

BEFORE one altar kneeling
 We worshipped side by side.
 Thy sacred Presence feeling,
 O Jesu Crucified!
 With angels and archangels
 We offered praise and prayer,
 But some who knelt beside us
 No more may worship there.

Yet in the high thanksgiving
 We deem they bear their part;
 The blessed dead, the living,
 Alike are one in heart;
 Although their holy voices
 Have soared to loftier strains,
 The one great Church rejoices,
 That fellowship remains.

Then pray we for the living,
 Then plead we for the dead,
 (For quick and dead are gathered
 In one, the only Head,)
 From "glory unto glory"
 That those may take their way;
 For grace that these may follow
 To greet them if they may.

The family hath members
That dwell 'neath sundered skies,
And some are here as pilgrims,
And some in Paradise.
For though awhile divided
The severed hosts may be,
'Tis still the same great army
On either side the sea.

And so in full communion
We offer praise and prayers,
They in our hearts remembered,
As we are borne in theirs.
At one High Altar kneeling,
We worship side by side;
The same dread Presence feeling.
O Jesu Crucified!

THE POCKET COMMUNION SERVICE.

ONLY a silver paten,
Such as a priest may bear
When he treads in men's darkened chambers
In the hours of their pain and care.
But the eyes that have watched that circlet,
Where the heavenly food hath lain,
Have opened at length in gladness,
And for ever have done with pain.

Only a slender chalice,
With a worn and a shining rim,
But it may be the lips that pressed it
Now join in the angels' hymn;
That the words of that last communion,
As they faded and died away,
Were the notes of Our Father's welcome
To a feast that is spread for aye.

Only a sound of weeping,
And the rush of the blinding tears,
While the touch of an angel's fingers
Unloosened the ties of years,
As the chamber was full of a Presence
That the watchers might hardly see,
And the breezes were ruffled a moment
With the breath of eternity.

Only a silver chalice,
A paten a priest might bear,
But it may be some souls were strengthened
By the Presence that lingered there.
As they gleamed on some bedside altar,
Ah ! sceptre and diadem
Were dull to the awful radiance
Of the splendour that clung to them.

At the end of the toilworn pathway,
On the shore of eternal things,
Where the shadows of time are shaken
With the rush of the angels' wings,
There may shine on the wasted features
A light from a far-off place,
And a nimbus that falls from heaven
Will gleam for a moment's space.

Some day, when our last communion
And the story of life are o'er,
When the touch of those sacred vessels
Can come to our lips no more,
Then the light of that long-loved Presence,
Here worshipped awhile by faith,
Will guide us beyond the shadows,
Through the grave and the gate of death.

THE ALMS DISH.

A WIDOW'S hand in days of old
 Gave more than all beside ;
 Her gift more costly far than gold,
 Bestowed with careless pride.
 So love that yieldeth all must be
 The first free gift we bear to Thee.

Thy treasury is open still,
 And there our gifts may pour :
 The contrite heart, the subject will
 Are offerings evermore,
 Which even Thine all-searching eyes
 May gaze upon and not despise.

Within one broadening stream unite
 The alms of rich and poor,
 All equal in Thy holy sight,
 Who press Thy temple floor ;
 How vain all earthly pride and place,
 When God and man are face to face !

The silver and the gold are Thine,
 We give Thee but Thine own,
 Whene'er within Thy sacred shrine
 We lay our offerings down ;
 Yet pleading, Great High Priest, receive
 The lowly gifts Thy children give.

They lie upon Thine altar now,
The while we kneel in prayer;
O knit again each broken vow,
That faith may conquer care;
Grant grace and peace, that life may be
An offering sacred all to Thee.

A FLOWER SERVICE.

"Thou hast the dew of thy youth."—Psalm cx. 3.

THE myrtles and the lilies,
 The roses red and white,
 In all their blended sweetness,
 Within these walls unite ;
 From many a stately mansion,
 From many a poor man's home,
 As gifts upon God's altar,
 The buds and flowerets come.

Sweet is the scent of violets,
 Borne on the breath of spring,
 But sweeter children's praises,
 That rise with heavenward wing ;
 And clearer than the dewdrop,
 That trembles on the spray,
 The holy eyes of childhood,
 When it kneels down to pray.

And some have brought the lily,
 The Blessed Virgin's flower,
 And some the soft moss roses
 From sheltered nook and bower ;
 While others searched with gladness
 In many a lonely spot,
 To bring as offerings, masses
 Of blue "forget-me-not."

And One, be sure, observeth
The lightest service done,
The cup of water offered
To cheer some suffering one ;
And He who watched the lilies,
And notes the wild bird's wing,
It may be, will remember
The flowers the children bring.

The fast unrolling future,
Amid its fleeting hours,
Will scatter round their pathway
Its sunshine or its showers ;
And as on yonder altar
The summer wreath is laid,
May those who brought them blossom
Where nothing bright can fade !

There is a radiant garden,
Though no man yet may see,
In all that far-off country,
How fair its flowers may be ;
Oh that the sunny faces
Amid these buds to-day
May there be safely gathered,
For ever and for aye !

MINISTERING SPIRITS.

TO MY ANGEL.

“Are they not all ministering spirits, sent forth to minister to them who shall be heirs of salvation?”—Heb. i. 14.

I CANNOT see thy shining wings,
 Or note thy raiment white,
 Or greet thee when the morning brings
 Its flood of golden light.
 I may not hear thy glorious voice,
 On yon serener air,
 But yet I bless thee, angel mine,
 For all thy wistful care.

Thou gazest on “Our Father’s” face,
 I may not gaze on thine,
 Or meet those sinless eyes, or trace
 Thy features line by line,
 Enough for me that far away,
 In yonder holy land,
 The Lord of angels bids me know,
 My elder brethren stand.

Thine eyes and mine have never met,
 They may not meet for years,
 Until mine own are closing fast
 To earthly smiles and tears.

Perchance, in that stupendous hour,
The veil of flesh may lift,
And show the nimbus round thy brow,
Like sunlight through a rift.

Thy gentle hands, perchance, e'er now,
Have folded to thy breast
The passing souls that sped their way
To everlasting rest.
The fair, far land of Paradise
Glowed softly through the mist,
Till thou hadst laid them gently down
Before the feet of Christ.

I know not yet how much I owe
To thy sweet ceaseless care,
What foes thy arm has warded off,
O warrior angel fair;
But ah! the waywardness of years
Might move thee well to scorn,
But that thy love is wonderful,
My brother elder born.

The Lord of angels and of men
In one sweet chain of love
Hath bound his lowly brethren here
With those who serve above.
And thus I hail thee, far away,
Till faith be changed to sight,
Until I greet thee face to face,
O guardian angel bright!

SILENT VOICES.

"He being dead yet speaketh."—Heb. xi. 4.

ONLY a pile of sermons,
 Dim with the dust of years,
 But yet they once were watered
 With loving thoughts and prayers.
 And perhaps the voice that uttered
 The truths still written here,
 With God's own radiant angels
 Has spoken many a year.

You may say that the views seem narrow,
 But I know that the heart was wide,
 And the clear keen truth fell kindly
 From a tongue that never lied ;
 You may call them, now, old-fashioned,
 But they checked some sins, I know,
 And they led some steps towards heaven,
 In the days so long ago.

They are only the earnest pleadings
 Of a faithful parish priest,
 Which breathe in these faded writings,
 Dusty and worn and creased.
 But Truth is the Truth for ever,
 And though he has passed away,
 The words of these faded sermons
 Will start into life some day.

Ears that once heard them lightly,
Hearts that were cased in pride,
Hands that clasped gain so tightly,
Feet that have stepped aside :
All at the last must gather,
Keeping the one great tryst,
Neighbour and friend and father,
All at the feet of Christ.

Only a pile of sermons,
Bread on the waters thrown ;
“Vox et præterea nihil,”
Scattered, and lost, and gone.
But Truth is the Truth for ever,
And these hidden seeds shall rise
When the sheaves are brought home with shouting
To the garner of Paradise.

THE RECTORY.

A GABLED house amid the trees,
 A porch, an ever-open door ;
 The peaceful murmur of the bees,
 A pathway trodden by the poor.

A garden all the children love,
 An orchard, and a brook thereby ;
 A stone's throw from the ancient walls
 God's Acre, where we all must lie.

A home in which to spend by faith
 Life's little round of hopes and fears ;
 A home to which in after days
 The children's hearts shall turn for years.

Old rooms where fresh young voices rise,
 Stone mullions where gold lichens grow,
 And casements which the westering skies
 Touch with their own far roseate glow.

The study wainscot, dark with age,
 Has something sacred in its gloom ;
 What hands have turned the sacred page !
 What prayers ascended from the room !

And some day, when the windows white
Tell all the hamlet "parson's gone,"
O that within the country bright
The Master's lips may say "Well done!"
AMEN.

THE OLD PATHS.

"Ask for the old paths."—Jer. v. 16.

THE good old Church of England,
 The ancient Faith and Line,
 She draws her strength and virtue
 From Christ the Heavenly Vine.
 This Church, which was our fathers',
 Is ours,—nor ours alone,
 For it shall be our children's
 When we ourselves are gone.

Her threefold cord abideth,
 The links lead back to Christ;
 She breathes Her Master's message,
 And all may heed who list.
 For still His gracious accents
 Ring in His servants' ears,
 "Lo, I am with you alway
 Throughout the changing years."

The battle grows around her,
 The sounds of strife are shrill,
 But yet the Cross her banner
 Goes surging onwards still.
 Though error's Babel legions
 Conspire to lay her low,
 Yet "in hoc signo vinces"
 Is shining on her brow.

What though the love of many
Perchance is waxing cold,
And robber hands would plunder
Her silver and her gold ?
Ten thousand times ten thousand,
Her own true children rise
To meet the world in conflict,
With eager fearless eyes.

O mighty Church of England,
Through thee our land is blessed,
Thy myriad sons and daughters
Yet love their mother's breast.
For thee our fathers witnessed,
In blood and fire and flame ;
For thee their children's children
Would even dare the same.

They kneel before thy altars,
Their voices rise to God,
They walk within those pathways
Which sainted feet have trod.
The suffrages of ages
Breathe on their lips to-day,
When in thy holy places
Thy children kneel and pray.

They prize thine ancient Order,
They hold the three great Creeds,
That Litany of ages
Which still so softly pleads ;
And come what may of trial,
Of storm or strife or ill,
Christ's ancient Church in England
Shall be our children's still.

OUR MOTHER CHURCH OF ENGLAND.

"Which is the mother of us all."—Galatians iv. 26.

OUR Mother Church of England
 A faithful witness bears,
 'Midst peace and happy sunshine,
 Or strife and storm and tears:
 The world may rage around her,
 Or Tempest's voice may roar,
 But One who stills the tumults
 Is with her evermore.

Built on the sure foundation
 Of Christ th' eternal Word,
 She shows the need of cleansing
 By water and by blood:
 Taught by the sacred pages,
 She holds the Orders three,
 That those who preach glad tidings
 May serve in just degree.

Within her grand Communion,
 Throughout the ages gone,
 The noblest hearts of England
 Have rested, one by one:
 Her very dust is sacred,
 Her very stones are dear,
 Her hallowed shrines have witnessed
 The prayer, the praise, the tear.

Within her walls our fathers
Have often knelt in prayer,
And mothers for their children
Have softly pleaded there :
Voice after voice grows silent,
Age after age goes by,
And still our lips are breathing
The same sweet Liturgy.

The battle cry is sounding,
Sad schism holds her tryst,
And hell makes fiery onslaughts
Against the fold of Christ.
But, like her glorious Master,
She scarcely deigns reply,—
And while her foes malign her
She lifts the cross on high.

There may be foes around her
Who make an angry stir,
But thousands more would offer
Their hearts' best blood for her ;
It is not yet extinguished—
The ardour of our sires,
The faith that trod the scaffold
And fed the martyr-fires.

Our Mother Church of England,—
O Saviour, keep her pure !
O Holy Spirit, guide her,
And lead her evermore !
O Triune God, defend her
Till earth's long night be past,
And o'er the seething waters
The daybreak stream at last !

BATTLE MUSIC.

"Speak unto the children of Israel that they go forward."
Exodus xiv. 15.

THE golden gates are parted,
 The awful veil is torn;
 The path is plain to follow
 Which sainted steps have worn.
 Now, who will bear Christ's armour,
 And with His sword on thigh,
 Beneath His shining standard
 Be bold to do or die?

The spears are sharp and eager
 That hedge Emmanuel's land;
 The foes are keen and countless
 As grains of ocean sand.
 No pathway strewn with roses,
 The track is stern and strait,
 But yet it leadeth upwards
 To yonder gleaming gate.

Not one swift rush of battle,
 Not one fierce wrench of pain,
 But years and years of fighting
 May mark the long campaign.

The hero hearts beside us
Fall fighting one by one,
Full weary are the warriors
Before the march is done.

Not always open conflict,
But ofttimes secret war,—
The toil, the snare, the ambush,
The sting, the scorn, the scar.
Hell's fiery darts are hurtling,
Not only in the light,
But in each darkened chamber,
Beneath the curtains white.

Hands that are hot with fever,
Eyes that are wet with tears,
Hearts that are sorely riven
With pangs and pains and fears,
Feet that are very weary,
All have their part to play
Before the tides of battle
Shall roll their waves away.

The serried ranks are frowning,
Yet some have safely pass'd,
And laid the dinted armour
Aside in peace at last.
Our elder warrior brethren
Around the gateway stand,
And grasp the guerdon given
By yonder nail-pierced Hand.

The festal halls are lighted,
Our feet may win them too ;
What saints have borne and suffered
Still saints may dare and do.
The foemen's swords are flashing :
How keen each angry blow !
But soon the peaceful garlands
Shall bind the patient brow.

Then lift the drooping standards,
And fight the fight of God.
The solemn march we travel
The victor hosts have trod.
Courage, true hearts ! and onwards !
Look up, ye tear-dimmed eyes,
And join the shining legions
That press to Paradise !

AT THE THRESHOLD.

“Behold, I stand at the door and knock.”—Rev. iii. 20.

A HAND is on the latch,
 A foot is at the door;
 A pleading voice entreats
 To cross the threshold o'er;
 But awful words
 Resound within:
 “Pass on, nor break
 The dream of sin.”

Is it the evening breeze
 That wanders softly by?
 Or was that whispered moan
 A deep soul-breathèd sigh?
 The hour is late,
 The dews are chill,
 But yonder feet
 Are patient still.

Beside the lintel yet,
 Though all unbid to stay!
 What urgent business binds?
 What tokens, stranger, say?
 “ My love compels:
 For tokens, see
 The scars I gained
 On yonder tree.

“ Behold, I stand and knock,
I may not knock for long ;
The flying moments haste,
But love is deep and strong.
Once more I knock,
Once more I pray :
Man ! wilt thou turn
Thy God away ? ”

And then a Hand is raised,
It bears a wan, deep scar ;
Back roll the stubborn bolts,
Down falls each ponderous bar.
The door is moved,
It shifts its place :
The twain are standing
Face to face.

No words, but with a smile,
He goes at once within,
Amidst the shades and gloom,
In spite of stain and sin.
And lit by love
And power divine,
The darkened hearth
Becomes a shrine.

WHILE THE EMBERS GLOW.

“God requireth that which is past.”—Eccles. iii. 15.

WHEN the curtains of the twilight
 Close around us one by one,
 While the deepening shadows whisper
 That the toils of day are done,
 Then our thoughts seem purer, clearer
 Than, alas! they often are,
 Brightening, as they draw the nearer
 To the land beheld afar;
 Then reflection gladly wanders
 From the daily toil and strife,
 As the musing spirit ponders
 On the fallen sands of life.

As we slowly turn the pages
 Of our changeful days and years,
 Oh, how many leaves are sullied,
 Blotted with repentant tears!
 Oh, how few there are whose whiteness
 Uncondemned may meet the eye!
 Oh, how few there are whose brightness
 Must not lose by scrutiny!
 Soiled and tarnished, marred and clouded,
 All their light and glory gone;
 Strangely mingled are our musings,
 As we search them, one by one.

Yet, amidst our self-wrought sorrows,
Nature teacheth holy things :
What a gentle placid glory
Goes through all her communings !
Still along life's chequered pathway
Varied lights and shadows play,
And to-day some eyes are smiling
Through the tears of yesterday.
Not for ever lasts the weeping,
Not in vain our hearts well o'er ;
E'en the very waves of anguish
Waft us to a brighter shore.

Just a little nearer heaven
Day by day we trust we are ;
Just a very little closer
To the coast that seems so far ;
Just a little less of sinning,
Fewer clouds to fleck the sky ;
Just a little nearer winning
The eternal victory ;
Just a very little purer,
Cleansed from some defiling blot ;
Just, we hope, a little surer
Of the crown that fadeth not.

Day by day, perhaps, our footsteps
Falter in the weary road ;
Yet each print is leading upwards
To the Paradise of God ;
To the house of many mansions,
To the kingdom of the blest,
Where the wicked cease from troubling,
Where the weary are at rest.

DOMUM, DULCE DOMUM !

“ In my Father's house are many mansions.”—St. John xiv. 2.

BEYOND the changeful splendours
 Where west winds softly play,
 And wave the dappled curtains
 Which fringe the far-away,
 The “ house of many mansions ”
 Lifts up its fair array.

Beyond life's restless surges
 The crystal sea gleams bright,
 And there the strings are sounding
 Which radiant harpers smite,
 Where now the saved are walking
 In sheeny robes of white.

The lambent air is gleaming
 With angels' lustrous wings,
 And there are eyes that gaze on
 A thousand glorious things,
 The outskirts of the splendour
 Which veils the King of kings.

And there are voices singing
The other side that sea ;
But here, ah ! no man showeth
How sweet those songs may be :
The echoes of that music
Sound in an unknown key.

But still beyond our sorrows,
So sad, so hard to bear,
Are fresh and bright to-morrows
Which wait us over there,
And ah ! to those who journey,
That far-off home is fair.

Beyond the yellow sunsets
Which streak the storm-tossed main,
The golden gates are gleaming
Through all the mist and rain ;
And none whose feet may win them
Shall feel the storms again.

INTERCESSION.

“Pray for one another.”—St. James v. 16.

PRAY for one another :
 Surely we might bear
 More each other's burdens
 On the wings of prayer.
 Many a trembling teardrop
 Might be wiped away,
 If the friends who loved us
 Did but kneel and pray.

Pray for one another :
 If we did but know
 Prayers were hovering round us
 Wheresoe'er we go,
 Death would lose its shadows,
 Life would lose its cares,
 Were we more supported
 By our loved ones' prayers.

Pray for one another :
 Jesus prays for you ;
 Follow those dear footsteps,
 Pray for others too.
 Think how, hanging anguished
 On that cross, He cried,
 “Father, O forgive them !”
 Just before He died.

Pray for one another :

Well we need these prayers,
'Midst our toils and strivings,
'Midst our fears and cares ;
Many a heart were lighter,
Many a tear were dry,
Many a robe were whiter,
Did they scale the sky.

Pray for one another ;

Keep that sacred tryst,
“ Bear each other's burdens ”
To the feet of Christ.
Plead we each for other
Through the little while,
Till our upturned faces
Catch the angels' smile.

SHADOWS ON THE WALL.

"Until the day break, and the shadows flee away."—Cant. ii. 17.

WHEN the light is softly waning,
 Comes a time for thought and prayer,
 While the soul unbinds the burden
 Of her daily cross and care.

Then, amidst the ghostly shadows
 Flickering faintly on the floor,
 Memory with her tender fingers
 Turns life's pages o'er and o'er,

Bringing back the vanished sunshine,
 Bringing back the childish mirth,
 Echoes soft as angel footsteps
 Sound once more again on earth.

Tones whose gentle winning pleadings
 Never may be quite forgot,
 Though the loving lips that spoke them
 Slumber on and answer not.

Day by day the cross grows lighter,
 While we keep our evening tryst,
 • Kneeling softly in the twilight
 At the gentle feet of Christ.

Some we miss are lying silent,
With their feet towards the east,
Waiting till the day-star rising
Call them to the bridal feast.

And we too in faith are waiting,
Though our faith be mixed with pain,
Till the dead who sleep in Jesus
Shall be given us back again,—

Given back in life and beauty,
Given back in deed and truth,
In their resurrection garments
Radiant with eternal youth.

All we loved in them expanded,
All the reunited ties
Knit again to last for ever,
With their tender sympathies.

Oh the holy raptured greetings
That shall thrill yon fragrant air!
Oh the blessed words of welcome
Waiting wanderers over there!

Oh how silver-sweet the voices!
Oh how fair the features grown!
“Changed from glory into glory,”
Changed, but still our own, our own.

As the light is softly waning,
And we kneel awhile in prayer,
Upwards, like the clouds of incense,
Float our thoughts to meet them there.

Sweet it is to pass a moment
Thus beyond our sighs and tears,
Past the sad reproachful voices
Of the wistful weary years !

Sweet to close the eyes, while fancy,
Soaring through these changeful skies,
Basks awhile in yonder regions
Warm with tints of Paradise,

Treads awhile the golden pathway,
Wanders by the crystal sea,
In the far-off deathless splendour
Of that glory that shall be

When these fleeting earthly sunsets
Shall be lost in fadeless day,
When the former things of sorrow
Pass for evermore away !

ALTA QUIES.

"He giveth His beloved sleep."—Psalm cxxviii. 2.

A FEW more nights of languor,
 A few more days of pain,
 A few more pulses' beatings
 And throbbings of the brain ;
 A few more sins and sorrows,
 A few more falls and fears,
 A few to-days, to-morrows ;
 And then an end to tears.
 For Jesus, the Good Shepherd,
 Shall claim His wandering sheep :
 He giveth His beloved
 The quiet gift of sleep.

A little more of conflict,
 Although perhaps my share,
 Instead of active service,
 May only be to bear ;
 A little farther onwards
 The burden must be borne ;
 Night lasts a little longer,
 And then the streaks of morn.
 Then He, the great Good Shepherd,
 Shall claim His wandering sheep,
 And give to His beloved
 The quiet gift of sleep.

Oh, sweet, at early morning,
To watch the golden sun
Light up the silent valleys
With glory, one by one.
Or sweeter still at even,
To seaward, when the light
Gleams like the gates of heaven,
So golden and so bright.
But sweeter still when Jesus
Shall throw those gates aside,
And call within their portals
The souls for whom He died,—
When He, their own Good Shepherd,
Shall claim each wandering sheep,
And give to His beloved
The quiet gift of sleep.

For me the morn is breaking,
Light floodeth all the vale,
The gentle hands that hold me
I know can never fail.
And though my sun is setting
Like evening in the west,
The ocean where it hideth
Is this—the Saviour's breast.
And Jesus, the Good Shepherd,
Shall claim His wandering sheep:
He giveth His beloved
The quiet gift of sleep.

ANASTASIS.

"From glory to glory."—2 Cor. iii. 18.

WHAT strange sights shall meet our eyes
 When they wake beyond the skies!
 Splendour past our best surmising,
 At that mighty rearing;
 When our long-lost loved ones greet us,
 When the dead in Christ shall meet us,
 While the startled air is bright,
 Trembling with excess of light.

What slight fetters hold us here!
 Time how short may take us there,—
 Take us from this land of sorrow
 To that ever bright to-morrow.
 One breath wanting, only one,
 And we stand beyond the sun,
 Finding with that failing breath
 Life begin to live in death.

Soon beyond the rolling hours,
 Past the sunlight and the showers,
 Free from links of earth that bound us,
 With those spells life wove around us.
 Just one strange electric shiver,
 And we stand beyond the river;
 In that moment snatched from time
 Life begins to be sublime.

Soon within the narrow bound
Of some unremembered mound,
Anxious aim and high endeavour
Lie at rest—at rest for ever.
Offsprings of the fever'd brain
Passed to nothingness again,
While our earthy mother's breast
Hides her earthy children's rest.

Then the scales of flesh shall fall
From the eyes they held in thrall,
As the spirit's powers expand
In the mystic spirit-land.
With our feet beyond the portal
Of the broadening life immortal,
What eternal progress waits,
Through and past the golden gates!

Round that cross to which we cling
Brightens an eternal spring :
Oh to touch with tightening clasp !
Oh to hold with firmer grasp !
Whiter garments here to wear,
Till we gain the vesture there,
In that solemn hour when we
Sail on yonder shoreless sea !

THROUGH THE RIFTS.

"The blue sky bends over all."—Christabel.

THE dreary mist is cold and grey,
The gentle rain begins to fall,
But not so very far away
The blue sky bendeth over all.

Though dark the rolling drift appears,
And bitter sweets that turn to gall,
Yet could we pass beyond our fears,
The blue sky bendeth over all.

Some eyes with wistful tears are wet,
And grief holds many a heart in thrall,
For time and death are strong—but yet
The blue sky bendeth over all.

When through the parting clouds of care,
Our ears shall catch the angels' call,
How sweet to reach the regions where
The blue sky bendeth over all!—

When all the sharpest pangs are past,
As pain itself begins to pall,
To find in God's own peace at last,
The blue sky bending over all!

THE TWO SPOTS.

“Thou shalt stand in thy lot at the end of the days.”—Dan. xii. 13.

THERE is a little plot of ground,
 Though where I cannot tell,
 But yet within its shelt'ring calm
 I think to slumber well.
 The sun shall shine, the sun shall set,
 The shadows rise and fall,
 While I shall lie there, hushed and still,
 At peace beyond them all.

Perhaps amid the bright green fields
 This unknown spot may lie,
 Where some grey village spire uplifts
 The cross toward the sky;
 Or else within the busy haunts
 Of toiling, striving men,
 The trampling of whose restless feet
 Will not disturb me then.

The pleasant breath of early spring
 May touch this plot of ground,
 Or autumn, with her golden sheaves,
 May spread her tints around,

Or wintry clouds may hide the sky,
And tempest's voice may roar;
But I shall be beyond the reach
Of storm for evermore.

The matins of the joyous lark,
The thrush's evensong,
The whispering of the twilight breeze,—
These sounds shall steal along;
And when the midnight bells ring out,
In tones so sweet and clear,
The chimings of the better land
Shall sound within mine ear.

* * * *

There is a spot,—it is on high,
I cannot tell you where;
But oh! 'tis in the light of God,
And Jesus will be there!
I cannot say how bright it is,
Or how its glories shine,
But it has been prepared for me,
And some day shall be mine,—

My very own for evermore:
For time, and sin, and death
Have never touched this blessed spot,
With their polluting breath.
The sands of time are wet with tears,
But those dear shores are bright;
These toilworn feet shall tread them soon,
'Mid resurrection light.

I cannot tell what gentle eyes
From thence are gazing now ;
I cannot tell what rainbow hues
Throw halos round the brow ;
I cannot say what accents make
Soft music on that air,
Until shall come the changeful hour,
And I myself be there.

But yet, sweet home in Paradise,
I greet thee from afar ;
Safe in thy calm unruffled peace,
The dead in Jesus are.
Fair harbour o'er the stormy sea,
How bright thy light appears !
Although we sometimes catch thy gleams
Behind a rain of tears.

COMFORT.

“As thy days so shall thy strength be.”—Deut. xxxiii. 35.

WHEN in sorrow's furnace tried,
 Lean thee on the Crucified;
 When thy heart is sore dismayed,
 Wrestle on, nor be afraid:
 Listen, this is writ for thee,—
 “As thy day, thy strength shall be.”

When thine eyes with tears are wet,
 Then remember Olivet!
 Know that He who, prostrate there,
 Poured away His soul in prayer,
 Counts thy pangs and notes thy sighs,
 Though He reigns beyond the skies.

If beneath the curtains white
 Thou must wake the weary night,
 While the awful fangs of pain
 Fasten on the shrinking brain,
 Still abides the firm decree—
 “As thy day, thy strength shall be.”

When the morning's wished-for gleams
 Wake thy fitful, fever'd dreams,
 And the daily cross appears
 Looming through a mist of tears,
 Turn thy weary heart aside:
 Rest thee on the Crucified.

By each anguished throb and throe
Borne so meekly years ago,
By the gentle hands outspread,
By the patient thorn-crowned head,
Kneel at yonder nail-pierced feet,
Till the bitter cup grow sweet.

Take the comfort there bestowed :
It will lighten all thy load ;
Succours sought and surely given,
Smooth the weary way to heaven.
Know that this was writ for thee,—
“ As thy day, thy strength shall be.”

When with features drawn and pale,
Thou must dare the darksome vale ;
As the closing eyelid falls,
'Tis the voice of Jesus calls :
“ Parting soul, arise, be free !
As thy day, thy strength shall be.”

PRESSING TOWARD THE MARK.

"Faint, yet pursuing them."—Judges viii. 4.

I'M faint, but yet pursuing ;
 Far off my home appears ;
 Sometimes its lights shine dimly
 Behind a veil of tears ;
 But be it midday splendour,
 Or drear beclouded noon,
 'Mid shine or storm or shadow,
 I'm slowly wrestling on.

Sometimes the way seems rugged,
 Sometimes the path is sweet,—
 Some steps must aye be trodden
 With wearied, bleeding feet ;
 But be it smoothed with mercies,
 Or rough with thorn and stone,
 Each step is one step nearer,
 And so I'm journeying on.

It is not always Marah,
 Not always desert ground,
 But Elims with their palm-trees
 Are oft-times gladly found.
 And as in Israel's wanderings,
 Where'er the pillar shone
 The tribes might safely travel,
 'Tis thus I'm journeying on.

My footsteps are but feeble,
And sometimes leave the track,
But One whose eyes are on me
In mercy leads me back.
Deep stains are on my garments,
But till those stains are gone,
In spite of falls and failures
I'm slowly wrestling on.

Some who once trod beside me
Have passed me in the race;
They wait within the shelter
Of yonder meeting-place.
Their ship has made the harbour,
Their storms are past and gone;
Yet, 'mid the waves and tempests,
I still am struggling on.

What steps must yet be taken,
'Tis not for me to say,—
Perhaps the journey's ending
Is not so far away;
But be it just before me,
Or in long years to come,
May each step take me nearer
To Christ, and rest, and home !

SOON.

"A little while."—Hebrews x. 37.

O H, what wilt thou be soon,
 O fluttering soul of mine?
 A little while, and thou must pass
 Beyond the bounds of time.
 Life's sands are falling
 One by one,
 But what when all
 Those sands are done?

I shall be sinless soon :
 Oh high majestic joy—
 A heart that only beats for God,
 And knows not sin's alloy!
 A stainless robe,
 A soul all pure,
 And thoughts all white
 For evermore.

I shall be tearless soon ;
 Now each day brings its pain,
 But soon these wistful weary eyes
 Shall never weep again.
 O mortal grief,
 How short thy sway,
 Ere God shall wipe
 All tears away!

I shall be deathless soon :
To-morrow's sun shall rise,
Yet I, or e'er it sets, may be
Beyond its purpled skies.
O truer life—
Eternity—
How soon my soul
May dwell with thee !

I shall be glorious soon :
My face is lined by care,
But you shall search these features o'er
In vain for sorrow there.
Soon shall each stain
Be cast aside—
I, like my Master,
Glorified.

I shall see angels soon—
Those elder sons of light—
And gaze upon each awful face,
Unutterably bright.
How soon those pure
Benignant eyes
May welcome speak
To Paradise !

And I shall soon behold
The dear ones of the past,
The friends who died long years ago,
And those I loved the last :
In Jesus they
Sleep one by one,
And I in Him
Shall slumber soon.

I shall see Jesus soon,
And here all words must cease,
His gaze will fill this throbbing heart
With deep unchanging peace.
For e'en on earth
The little while
Is lighted by
His tender smile.

THE OTHER SIDE.

The land that is very far off."—Isaiah xxxiii. 17.

JUST beyond the river,
 Oh how sweet and pure
 Is the peace that circles
 All the sinless shore!
 Never sigh or sadness
 Wounds the gentle air,
 Only words of gladness
 Make the language there.

Just beyond the river,
 What a welcome waits
 Those who once but enter
 Through the shining gates!
 What sweet eyes may glisten
 In that distant home!
 What quick ears may listen
 Till each loved one come!

Just beyond the river
 Childish feet have trod,
 Wafted o'er the waters,
 To the peace of God.
 In the regions yonder
 What a fadeless glow,
 Circles with its wonder
 Many an infant brow!

Just beyond the river
Voices we may hear,—
Tones for which we've wearied
Many and many a year!
Lips we kissed so sadly
In those tearful days
There are parted gladly
In the strain of praise.

Just beyond the river
Glow's immortal light ;
While we watch and wonder,
All the strand is bright :
See, the tints are streaming
Through the trembling air ;
Flashing forms are gleaming
'Mid the glories there.

Just beyond the river
There is One who stands
With the nail-prints written
In His tender hands,—
One whose voice is calling,
"Weary wanderers, come!"
Yes, those sweet words, falling,
Float across the foam.

Just beyond the river
There is room for you :
Will you reach those regions
Jesus asks you to ?
Are your sins as scarlet ?
He is one, you know,
Who can wash those garments
Whiter than the snow.

Just beyond the river,
Or to gain or loss,
In a few swift seasons
One by one we cross :
Though we shrink and shiver,
As we face the tide,
Just beyond the river
Lies the brightest side.

DE PROFUNDIS.

"In the hour of death and in the day of judgment, good Lord deliver us."—Litany.

AS day by day the lessening thread
Of life frays out its golden strands,
Our hours are numbered with the dead,
Our glass is filled with fallen sands.

The vessel speeds with flashing keel,
And bears the buffets of the waves;
But soon the quivering ship must reel
On yonder shore all thick with graves.

The warmest blood must lose its heat,
The surest feet go down the hill,
The strongest pulse must cease to beat,
And all the stormy heart be still.

Our eyes are wet with wistful tears,
Our brows are bent with brooding thought;
We scan our sheaf of changeful years,
And all our musings come to nought.

The air is filled with taunting cries,
The bitter cup o'erflows the brim;
The gloom of death is in the skies,
And all the shining shore is dim.

Oh, mighty strength that cannot fail,
Oh, love that knowest how and why,
In pity stoop and rend the veil,
And tell us what it is to die !

We hear those awful accents call
Our lives that wander to and fro,
But let some gleams of sunshine fall
Amid the shadows as we go.

Oh, gentle hands that hold the cross
Before the glazing eye in death,
Let gain be perfected in loss,
And strengthen all the cords of faith.

The tangled riddles all unread,
The things too hard to understand,
The mysteries that time has bred,
We leave within that nail-pierced Hand.

For love can read the scroll aright,
The bitter cross can give the key,—
From Calvary there streams a light
That flashes o'er the shoreless sea.

THE LAND BEYOND THE SEA.

"Homesick we are for thee,
Calm land beyond the sea!"—Faber.

BEYOND the sunset, far away,
Beyond the heather-tinted lea,
There glows a country strangely sweet,
A land that lies beyond the sea.

Beyond the crests which rise and fall,
Past clouds whose purple pales to grey,
Outstretch those shores more bright than all,
Fair shores that shine so far away!

The sun may set in crimson haze,
His dying splendours streak the tide,
But yet no shades of evening dim
The brightness of that further side.

And while the drifting cloud-wrack falls,
As breakers thunder on the shore,
The feet that tread yon golden sands
Have done with storms for evermore.

Anon, when ocean's breast is hushed,
As daybreak waketh fresh and fair;
No sunlight tints those far-off hills,
'Tis everlasting morning there.

The wistful eyes are over there :
Tears dimmed them oft this side the sea ;
But in the land they gaze on now
Nor sorrowing nor sigh can be.

The weary feet are over there,
Which here were often pained and sore,
But now they tread those peaceful shores,
And shall feel weary nevermore.

The loving hands are over there :
Of friends, the trusted and the tried,
And they shall grasp our own ere long,
When we ourselves have passed the tide.

The quiet hearts are over there :
Here ofttimes throbbed each fluttering breast ;
But now eternal peace is theirs
Within that better land of rest.

Beyond the mists which float and rise,
And fill this sorrow-laden air,
Outstretch the ever cloudless skies
Of that dear country over there.

Like some tired mariner, whose bark
Drops anchor where he fain would be,
May we, when strife and storm are past,
Reach that fair land beyond the sea !

THE VIGIL.

"Let me go, for the day breaketh."—Genesis xxxii. 26.

JESUS each night is watching
 Beside each sufferer's bed ;
 Oft as the shadows darken
 Around each aching head
 He notes those weary tossings
 Which seek for rest in vain,
 And whispereth "In heaven
 There shall be no more pain."

Oh, some of His lie wakeful
 On beds as soft as down,
 And some on hard rough pallets
 In country or in town ;
 But yet there's One who's watching
 Where'er His people lie,—
 Amid the shadows, Jesus
 Is surely standing by.

The gold without the furnace
 Were else all dulled and dim ;
 Some hearts alone by anguish
 Grow fit and meet for Him.
 Our souls shrink back in weakness
 When first the flames they view,
 But we forget that Jesus
 Walks 'mid the burning too.

In many a far-off chamber,
 Though hid from mortal sight,
The gleaming angel pinions
 Are folded soft to-night.
And feet that halt and tremble
 With fear to stem the tide
Will pass the waters safely
 If Jesus stand beside.

Far in the east the starlight
 Grows faint and fainter still,
As gleams that tell of daybreak
 Creep up the window-sill.
The lattices are shaking,
 A soft wind moves the door,
And lo! the watching angels
 Spread wide their wings once more.

A shout of welcome yonder,
 A wail from earth below—
The disembodied spirits
 Float on the sunrise glow.
In many an earthly chamber
 The salt, salt tears well o'er,
But the house of many mansions
 Is fuller than before.

SHADOW-LAND.

EACH heart has a haunted room,
 Where, amidst the hallowed gloom,
 Deep within its shelter laid,
 Dwell the memories of the dead.
 Sometimes in the twilight hours
 Shadowy lips seem pressed to ours ;
 Sometimes round th' unconscious head
 Footsteps as of angels tread,
 Palms that in the years ago
 Sought our own in weal or woe.
 Towards us stretch with waving hand
 From that death-divided strand.
 Accents strangely sweet and clear,
 Silent many and many a year,
 In and out the wearied brain
 Wander like a soft refrain ;
 As the tones which gently sound
 Fall and float on holy ground.
 Ah ! this chamber in the breast
 Harbours many a longed-for guest :
 Some are young, and some are old ;
 Some lie pale beneath the mould :
 Yet within this chamber door
 We can meet them all once more.
 Little hands so soft and clinging,
 Little voices blithe and ringing,

Brows all bright with manhood's glory,
Brows so patient, seamed, and hoary.
Lips on which the turf has lain
Whisper kindly words again ;
Eyes that scan yon angel bowers
Turn once more to answer ours ;
Feet the waves of death have wet
Turn and walk beside us yet.
While they in this chamber tread,
We may hardly deem them dead.
Called to earth from shadow-land,
Fresh and beautiful they stand :
Buds that withered years ago
Seem once more to bloom and blow ;
Hopes so sweet they faded fast,
Ere the morning's dews were past—
Hopes perchance to blossom still
In the land invisible.
Seeds we watered oft with tears
Yield in those eternal years
An unshaded world of bliss,
Sought, but vainly sought, in this.
Here on earth they had their root,
There beyond they bear their fruit ;
Here the sowing and the weeping,
There the harvest-tide and reaping :
Here they faded like the leaves,
There the Master binds the sheaves.
Yes, this chamber in the breast
Glow with many a wondrous guest,
Tender gleams and glints that come
From the many-mansioned home.

EVENTIDE.

“At evening time it shall be light.”—Zech. xiv. 7.

AS the day's declining gleams
 Fall upon some tree or tower,
 Increase of each beauty seems
 Yielded in that fleeting hour.

When the summer's splendour fades,
 Ere the wintry blasts are near,
 With what witching tints and shades
 Does the autumn gold appear!

When the strains of music die,
 Ere the soaring echoes fall,
 How the latest soft-breathed sigh
 Seems the sweetest of them all!

When we bend, all succour past,
 Over lips so pale and dead,
 How the tones that thrilled them last
 Seem the dearest words they said!

When the beating clock of Time
 Points to midnight with its hands,
 How the straining woof of life
 Woven seems with golden strands!

When asleep on Jesus' breast
Sinks the Christian's wearied brow,
Gleams from yon celestial hills
Spread around a fadeless glow.

Calm upon the quiet eyes,
Rest upon the forehead fair:
Those who scan the wasted face
Feel the peace of God is there.

REUNION.

"I shall go to him, but he shall not return to me."—2 Sam. xii. 23.

MET again to part no more,
 After all the weary years;
 Met again, the weeping o'er,
 After all the scalding tears,—

After sin's delusive snares,
 After struggles, hopes and sighs;
 After sorrows calmed by prayers,
 Met again, in Paradise.

Met again in fullest light,
 "Heart to heart, and hand to hand,"
 After wanderings in the night,
 Wanderings God can understand.

After all the smiles and tears,
 After all the hushed, low prayers;
 After all the hopes and fears,
 Life's bewildering, blinding cares.

Met within that Presence high,
 Where our chains are cast aside
 By the strength that stooped to die,
 To be scourged and crucified.

In His presence evermore
Who has burst sin's galling bands,
Torn from death the sting it bore,
Writ our names upon His hands.

Here all minor chords shall die,
Life's weird notes so sad and dreary,—
"Jubilates" now on high
Take the place of "Miserere."

THE MORNING WATCH.

"Until the day break, and the shadows flee away."
Canticles ii. 17.

A SILVER shield in sapphire set
 Upon the lone, lone sea :
 The charmèd moon, with drowsy spell,
 Sheds splendour dreamily ;
 A trembling pathway o'er the tide,
 Her faint, sweet light is led,
 Like that wan, wistful beauty lent
 The features of the dead.

The soft white scud goes floating by,
 Like some bright, fleecy veil,
 In which the haughty moon has wrapped
 Her fair, proud face so pale.
 And sadly sweet the chill light falls,
 'Mid clouds like drifting snow,
 Or gleams of awful radiance flashed
 From fallen angels' brow.

And far away the noiseless ships
 Go sailing to and fro,
 Their spectral shrouds all ghostly white
 Beneath the moonlit glow.
 While on the gleaming wet sea-sand,
 With measured, echoing moan,
 The weird eternal ocean rolls
 Its strange, deep undertone.

O summer sea, sweet summer sea!

Thy spell is deep and lone;

The surges on thy silver sands

Fall flashing, one by one.

Yet, could I claim the seabird's wing,

And climb yon radiant stair,

My baffled hope and heart must find

But disappointment there.

Soon, like some hues of Paradise

Faint in the purple east,

The "roseate tints of dewy morn"

Will blush on ocean's breast;

But when shall that dear morning come,

The answer to her tears,

Which this sad earth has wearied for

Full eighteen hundred years?

PART II.

RIGHI SUNSET.

“ Until the day break, and the shadows flee away.”
Canticles ii. 17.

SOFT light upon the Righi,
 Upon the lakes below ;
 The witching, transient, roseate tints
 Which Alpine sunsets know.
 Mountains in purple glory,
 Dark valleys robed in grey,
 Red streaks and gleams of splendour,—
 But all to pass away.

Soft light upon the Righi,
 Clouds edged with crimson fire,
 Red bars with orange blending
 Each flickering lance and spire,
 A thousand shapes of beauty,
 A thousand tints and glows,
 And like some angel's robe on earth
 Those far-off Alpine snows.

Soft light upon the Righi,
 Though fair thy sun and shine,
 Yet earth shall know a fairer scene,
 A splendour passing thine.
 Though gemmed with light and beauty,
 Lucerne, thy wavelets be,
 Yet what their flashing brightness
 To thine, O crystal sea ?

Oh, brighter than the "Glarnisch,"
With all its silvery sheen,
The land no stain can tarnish,
Which eye hath not yet seen!
Soft light upon the Righi,
How fair thy roseate skies!
But oh the fadeless, deathless glow
That circles Paradise!

THE NAME IN SAND.

I WROTE a name upon the sand,
 Beside the moaning surf;
 'Twas but the empty name of one
 Long silent 'neath the turf.
 I watched the rippling, laughing waves
 Break softly on the shore;
 But love and life looked desolate,—
 My heart was sad and sore.

'Twas sunset on the purpled sea;
 I watched that thrice-loved name,
 As far to westward sank the light
 In one broad blaze of flame;
 While near and nearer crept the tide,
 Until at last, effaced,
 That name that was the world to me
 Lay blotted and erased.

“Ah! thus,” thought I, “Eternity
 Blots out Time’s golden sands;
 The waves of that tremendous sea
 Part hopes and hearts and hands.”
 But from the westward then there flashed
 A ray so pure and sweet:
 A message from that far-off shore
 Was lying at my feet.

A message without voice, and yet
I knew its meaning well;
For Nature sometimes writes her thoughts
Too deep for words to tell,
And in that opal-tinted streak,
That flashed across the sea,
God's finger, tipped with living light,
Was writing words for me.

"In vain," it said, "thy love would strive
To write that name in sand;
'Tis graven in the roll of those
Who tread the deathless land.
And thou, whene'er thy heart is sad,
When life seems hard to bear,
Then think of that dear, far-off home,
And one who waits thee there."

Long years ago, long years ago,
Those streaks of splendour died,
Like tresses which the golden sun
Trailed o'er the shimmering tide.
But still, whene'er that tender light
Glowes over shore and lea,
I think of that sweet message flashed
That evening o'er the sea.

THE BROKEN FLOWER.

"He shall carry the lambs in His bosom."—Isaiah xl. 11.

O H, bind her hair with roses,
 Wreath clusters o'er that brow ;
 The sleep where death reposes
 Has mantled o'er its snow ;
 And joy, and pride, and sorrow
 Have died from out those eyes,—
 They gaze on Life's to-morrow,
 And see in Paradise.

The things we dare not fathom,
 The thoughts we may not know,
 In all their perfect beauty
 Our darling knoweth now.
 No dream of sorrow darkling
 May cloud the eye of faith,
 For shade is lost in lustre,
 And life begins in death.

Her hands are meekly folded
 Across her gentle breast,
 Her fingers twined for ever
 For one unbroken rest.
 And in a dreamless slumber,
 With marbled brow and chill,
 She lieth, veiled in silence,
 And passionless and still.

The white rose nestles softly
Beside that cold, cold cheek,
Which lieth pale and changeless,
So wan, and pure, and meek.
The myrtle's spray is peeping
From out that golden hair,
But ah ! the fairest floweret
Lies crushed and broken there,—

A flower amid the flowerets,
A pale and broken flower,
Now sown in tearful weakness,
Then raised in wondrous power ;
Though these shall fade and wither,
Like rosebuds on the pall,
She hears the "Come up hither,"
And blooms beyond them all.

A lovely star has fallen
From our terrestrial sky,
And with a blaze of beauty
Has swept its glory by.
But oh ! it gleameth brighter,
With purer, clearer glow,
Amid the shining circlet
That binds the thorn-crowned Brow.

LITTLE EVELYN.

“Is it well with the child?”—2 Kings iv. 26.

LITTLE Evelyn, where is she?
 Ask where last year's rosebuds be?
 Where the songs so sweet and low
 Breathed but one short hour ago?
 Where the changeful opal light
 Of the sunset yesternight?
 Where the tints on yonder lea?
 Where the hues that streaked the sea?—
 Live these on, though lost to view?
 Little Evelyn lives so too.

Little Evelyn, where is she?
 Who knows where the angels be?
 Who can say how soft the breast
 Where the lambs are lulled to rest?
 Who can tell how pure the flowers
 Wreathing those eternal bowers,
 Or how fair 'neath yonder skies
 Grow the plants of Paradise?
 Questions these we cannot tell:
 Maybe Evelyn knows them well.

Little Evelyn, where is she?
Ask, but who shall answer thee?
Who can tell how sweet and wise
Shine those childish, wistful eyes?
Or how bright those features now,
With the rays around her brow?
Who may say what raiment white
Wraps those tender limbs to-night?
Love and grief are hushed; I wist,
Little Evelyn is with Christ.

A MOTHER'S ARMS.

(FOUNDED UPON A WELL-KNOWN STORY.)

“As one whom his mother comforteth.”—Isaiah lxvi. 13.

A LITTLE child was dying ;
 A mother watched beside ;
 With wistful gaze of anguish
 The blue eyes open wide.
 A mother's tears were falling
 Beside that restless bed,
 As all in vain she tried to soothe
 The tossing golden head.

She spoke of all the brightness
 Of that eternal place,
 Where little children's angels
 Look on our Father's face ;
 Of all its sheeny splendour,
 Of more than rainbow skies.
 “But, mother,” sighed a little voice,
 “The light would hurt my eyes.”

In grief she changed her story,
 And told the suffering child
 What music fills those golden halls
 By sorrow undefiled—
 The voice of many waters
 So rich and deep and free—
 And of the white-robed harpers
 Beside the crystal sea ;

Of that sweet song that ringeth
With more than silver notes,
Of all that glad rejoicing,
God's melody, that floats
Through all the streets of Zion,
'Mid merry girls and boys.
But then there came a little sob :
" I could not bear the noise."

And then, in grief and anguish,
With salt tears blinding fast,
She took the little fevered head
Upon her breast at last ;
While from that restful shelter
There came the whispered prayer,—
" Mother, if heaven is like this,
May Jesus take me there !

MARY'S VOYAGE.

"Jesus called a little child unto Him."—St. Matt. xviii. 2.

THREE fair-haired little maidens
 Were playing by the sea
 One golden summer's evening,
 As blithe as blithe could be.
 Their guardian angels near them
 Beheld their childish glee.

Loud rang their sunny laughter,
 For each in turn would dare
 A raid upon old ocean,
 As, wild with tossing hair,
 They chased the murmuring wavelets,
 With feet all pink and bare.

Said rosy blue-eyed Una,
 "I wish the stones around
 Were changed to gold and silver,
 As on Tom Tiddler's ground :
 I'd gather handfuls of them,
 And keep them, I'll be bound."

"And I," said pretty Ida,
 "Wish I were rich and great,
 To buy the castle yonder,
 With all its fair estate ;
 And there I'd live in grandeur,"
 Said little miss, sedate.

Said gentle, soft-eyed Mary,
 "I wonder where the sun
Can go to every evening,
 As soon as day is done :
If I'd a ship, I'd follow,—
 And wouldn't that be fun ?

The sails should each be purple,
 The seats all ivory,
The oars should all be golden,
 And you should come with me.
Then we would go a-sailing
 Across the dear old sea."

* * * *

Mary has gone a-sailing,
 But has not come again
To tell us of the country
 She found across the main,—
The everlasting sunshine,
 Beyond the mists and rain.

The sails were not all purple,
 But white and cold were they ;
The oars were not all golden,
 But soiled with mould and clay ;
And they have wafted Mary,
 Oh, somewhere far away !

Mary has gone a-sailing :
 The sunlight she may see
Is all too bright and peaceful
 For earth to bring to me.
Those little feet are resting
 The other side the sea.

FLOWERS AMID THE CORN.

“Of such is the kingdom of heaven.”—St. Matt. xix. 14.

A BROTHER died long years ago,—
 God's glory hides him now,—
 Nor sin nor pain, had time to stain
 My little kinsman's brow,
 Upon that childish head of down
 The cross so soon became a crown;
 How sweet its light and glow!

A little maid with gentle eyes
 Sings by a far-off sea,
 And when I dream, I think they seem
 To turn and gaze on me.
 When Christian children sink to rest,
 They slumber on their Saviour's breast,
 And so, I know, doth she.

Long years ago, in Syrian land,
 His lips said, Ἀφετε,
 Let children dear to Me draw near,
 καὶ μὴ κωλύετε:
 My life for theirs is freely given,
 They see My Father's face in heaven:
 τὰ παῖδιά ἄφετε.

Our earthly flowers amid the corn
Have angels pure and wise,
Whose loving guard keeps watch and ward
Before the awful eyes
Of Him whose Son, the Virgin-born,
Partook our weakness and its scorn :
O depth of mysteries !

Perhaps in that tremendous hour,
When, worn by years and pain,
Our eyelids close in that repose
Which waketh not again,—
To bid us to the far-off home
The little loving feet may come,
For which our hearts are fain.

A few swift rolling seasons here,
How short their span appears !
And we shall press with soft caress
The lips we've mourned for years !
As round us smile the long shut eyes
That meet our own with sweet surprise
Last seen through mists and tears.

O King of that dear far-off land,
Upon whose glittering shore
The children wait within that gate
Through which they pass no more :
Oh, grant that, purified from sin,
Our feet may each be planted in
Thy footsteps gone before !

LUX E TENEBRIS.

“Why art thou cast down, O my soul?”—Psalms xlii. 5.

O WEARY heart so sad and sore,
 O eyes that tears will sometimes dim,
 O toilworn feet that seek the shore
 Where those in white shall walk with Him :
 The little while will soon be past,
 And God's own peace be gained at last.

Amidst the thronging world ye press,
 Yet lonely oft your pulses beat ;
 But oh, what joy when face to face
 The gathered hosts of God shall meet !
 There will be company enow
 In yonder multitude, I trow.

As day by day the sun goes down,
 As night by night the darkness falls,
 Ye weary for the golden sheen
 Which floods the everlasting halls ;
 And cry, “Oh, roll the gates aside
 Which those unfading splendours hide !”

O knees that faint beneath the cross,
 O eyes that weary for the light,
 O arms that hang so feebly down,
 A little longer urge the fight :
 A few more strokes against the foe,
 And then the rest which victors know !

How fair the sunshine after rain !

How glad the smiles that follow tears !

But sweeter far the sacred peace

Which waits beyond our storm-tossed years :

The cross is hard to bear to-day ;

The crown is bright that shines for aye.

The strand is not so far away ;

And though the awful waves may fall,

The vessel, spite of storm and spray,

Shall reach the haven after all ;

The harbour bar will soon be passed,

And anchorage be gained at last.

THE EVERLASTING SHORE.

"The land that is very far off."—Isaiah xxxiii. 17.

SOME notes of my heart's music
Are hushed for evermore,
They have floated past the river
To the everlasting shore.

They have crossed the restless torrents
Of the turbid stream of time ;
But they sound beyond the waters
With measured dulcet chime.

Some flowers, so wan and drooping,
I thought they wholly died,
Are blooming fresh and radiant
Across the swollen tide.

Some lightsome feet whose echoes
I thought were hushed and dead
Now throng those far-off portals
Where saints and angels tread.

Soft hands whose loving pressure
Once soothed each restless mood
May yet enfold my fingers
Beyond the rolling flood.

Dear lips, whose pallid beauty
Like faded rosebuds lies,
May yet pronounce my welcome
Where nothing lovely dies ;

And gentle eyes whose glances
Lie veiled and hushed in night
Shall look once more upon me
In resurrection light.

The shattered hopes I cherished,
The thoughts once fresh and free,
Are only garnered yonder,
The other side the sea.

There are some notes whose sweetness
Must die away in pain,
And some whose tender gladness
May not return again.

And though on earth their music
Be heard, alas ! no more,
It has floated o'er the river
To the everlasting shore.

A CHILD'S MATINS.

ALL in the morning's golden sun
 I kneel me down in prayer,
 And thank Thee that Thy tender love
 Hath made the world so fair.
 As Thou hast kept me through the night,
 So guard me in the hours of light.

With folded hands and bended knee
 A little maiden calls ;
 O Father, let her voice approach
 Thine everlasting halls.
 Thou hear'st the ravens when they cry,
 And dearer to Thine heart am I.

My body guard from hurt and pain,
 My soul from soil of sin ;
 Oh ! let no seeds of evil rest
 My childish heart within.
 May pride and anger take their flight,
 And e'en my very thoughts be white.

Let Thy sweet love compassionate
 Reach all for whom I pray :—
 My father and my mother bless,
 Both this and every day ;
 My brothers and my sisters dear,
 And all I love both far and near.

A little maiden, in the light
Of this sweet summer morn
I kneel, and know Thou will not treat
My simple cry with scorn ;
For while I plead and ask Thy grace,
The children's angels see Thy face.

And so, for His dear sake who died
Such long, long years ago,
A little trustful maiden kneels
In this fair sunrise glow :
O Father, keep her good and pure
Until the sunlight fades no more.

A CHILD'S EVENSONG.

A LITTLE maiden at Thy feet,
 I bend my knees in prayer,
 And plead that Thou, for Jesus' sake,
 Wilt keep me in Thy care :
 But ere the gloom of night begins
 I ask forgiveness for my sins :—

For all that I have said or done
 That has been wrong and bad,
 For all the vain and idle thoughts
 My childish heart has had,
 Father, forgive Thy little lamb,
 And make me holier than I am.

My father and my mother bless,
 Those whom I love so well ;
 My brothers and my sisters dear,
 And all with whom I dwell.
 O heavenly Father, keep them all,
 And let no evil hap befall.

A little maiden at Thy feet,
 Before Thy throne I fall ;
 I open wide my childish heart
 And simply tell Thee all :
 Secure that Thou wilt deign to bless
 Thy little handmaid's trustfulness.

So now, for His dear sake who died
That I might die to sin,
Who opened wide the golden gates
That I might enter in,
Father, preserve Thy little child,
And keep her good and undefiled.

NEW YEAR'S MORNING.

OLD Father Time is resting
 His scythe beside the door,
 As he crieth, "Little children,
 I bring you one year more,
 A gift all white and sinless,—
 But when I come again,
 I shall find some marks upon it,
 Some trace of toil and stain.
 Yet take this year and keep it
 As white as best you may,
 Till I claim it for my Master
 When next I pass this way."

Old Father Time is shaking
 His glass beside the door,
 And the golden sands are falling,
 They are falling evermore.
 They are falling in the daytime,
 When the sun is warm and high;
 They are falling in the midnight,
 When the stars are in the sky.
 Falling, for ever falling,
 While new years come and pass,
 As old Father Time is shaking
 The sands within the glass.

Old Father Time has taken
His glass, and scythe, and all,
And the year he carrieth with him
Is gone beyond recall.
But the bright new gift he bringeth
Lies spread before your door :
God help you, little children,
To keep it white and pure,
To guard it well for Jesus,
Until you reach the place
Where little children's angels
Behold the Father's face.

DIVERS PATHS.

•

“ I will bring the blind by a way which they know not.”—Isa. xlii. 16.

SOME footsteps climb the mountains,
 While others tread the vale ;
 On some the sunlight falleth,
 On some the sleet and hail.
 These tracks, how stern and rugged !
 Those, smooth and quickly passed !
 But in the golden city
 The King's ways meet at last.

Across the burning deserts
 Some pilgrim footsteps go,
 While others press in silence
 The noiseless fields of snow.
 With some the way is weary,
 With some it flies so fast ;
 Yet in the golden city
 The King's ways meet at last.

On some, sweet voices singing
 Make music far and near ;
 On some, the stones are watered
 With many and many a tear.
 Some wind in shade and quiet,
 Some bear a throng so vast ;
 Yet in the golden city
 The King's ways meet at last.

Some on the curling billows
Which sweep the angry sea
Are borne towards the haven
In which they fain would be ;
Some by the softest breezes
That wanton round the mast ;
Yet in the golden city
The King's ways meet at last.

Some in the sunset glories
Float down the peaceful flood,
While others' toilworn footsteps
Are tracked by tears and blood.
For each the same bright welcome,
When voyage or march are past,
For in the golden city
The King's ways meet at last.

Eternal hands have planned it ;
Whate'er the path, I know
It leadeth to the country
To which I fain would go.
So, be it shine or shadow,
Aside let fear be cast,
Since in the golden city
The King's ways meet at last.

PAX DEI.

"With Christ, which is far better."—Phil. i. 23.

THEY are gone to be with Jesus,
 We cannot wish them here ;
 We would not dim their radiant lot
 With mortal stain or tear ;
 For they are folded safely
 Upon that gentle breast,
 Where many a weary lamb of earth
 Has found eternal rest.

They are gone to be with Jesus,
 To be in that sweet home
 Where want, and wistfulness, and pain
 Can never, never come.
 Their steps are with the angels,
 'Mid paths all fair and bright,
 Where never stain of sin can fall
 Like shadows on the light.

They are gone to be with Jesus,
 So who would wish them back
 To tread the rugged stones that lie
 In life's uncertain track ?
 Their fears and falls are over,—
 Nor falls nor fears were vain,—
 But who would wish those lips to taste
 The bitter cup again ?

They are gone to be with Jesus ;
Ah ! would that we were there !
That these so anxious hearts were hushed,
With all their pain and care !
They rest in yonder regions :
Oh that we too might go
To stand beside life's crystal stream,
Where healing waters flow !

They are gone to be with Jesus ;
And when the time is best,
Those loving arms that shelter them
Shall take us there to rest ;
And we shall be with Jesus,
Redeemed from stain and sin :
Those noiseless gates shall open wide,—
We, too, shall enter in.

COMPASSION.

"The long-suffering of our Lord is salvation."—2 St. Peter iii. 15.

THERE are some deep feelings,
Which we scarce disclose;
Be this thought borne with them :
There is One Who knows,—

Knows our faults and failings,
Soiling day by day ;
Yet His deep compassion
Doth not turn away.

Not to friends the dearest,
On whose love we call,
Tell we all our vileness :
Jesus knows it all,—

All our stains and strivings,
All our wants and woes :
Oh, how sweet that Jesus
Loves us though He knows !

Oft our wayward footsteps
Turn to leave the fold,
Yet the hands that clasp us
Do not loose their hold.

Human love, though tender,
Yields to years at last ;
But that love we lean on
Holdeth firm and fast.

Human eyes, though eager,
Fail their watch to keep ;
But the eyes of Jesus
Slumber not nor sleep.

Human ears, though patient,
Turn at last away ;
But the ear we plead with
Bendeth down for aye.

May His gentle pleadings
Wean our hearts from ill,
As we think with wonder—
“Jesus loves me still.”

RAYS.

“The Lord knoweth the thoughts of man.”—Psalm xciv. 11.

THEY pass in silence from the brain,
 And some are clothed in light;
 Then in a moment earth and sky
 Seem beautiful and bright.
 Fair flying moments sometimes given
 Make earth seem scarcely earth, but heaven
 So beautiful, so bright!

Some thoughts lie hidden deep and sure,
 Within the far recess
 Of many a rugged simple heart,
 That keeps its tenderness.
 Such thoughts, methinks, are oftentimes hid
 Beneath some mouldering coffin lid,
 Sacred through tenderness.

A little thing may bring them forth:
 A lock of flaxen hair;
 The chime of far-off village bells
 Upon the summer air;
 Some old-time ballad's soft refrain,
 Which pale hushed lips may ne'er again
 Breathe on that summer air.

Some thoughts lie buried in the past,
 Beneath the load of years,
And some lie hid within the breast,
 Too deep, too deep for tears.
The years may come, the years may go,
Yet undertones like these we know
 Lie all too deep for tears.

Some thoughts seem borne on angels' wings,
 Beyond the purple light
That edges, like a braid of gold,
 The soft grey robe of night.
So wild, so weird, so pure, so free,
They wander through eternity,
 Beyond earth's cloud and night.

No seraph at those sunset gates
 Guards now life's healing tree,
The crimson of those far-off clouds
 Speaketh of Calvary.
A thought may pass those golden bars,
May wing a path beyond the stars,
 Towards the crystal sea.

I hear a voice beside that sea
 I've longed to hear for years ;
I see a face whose gentle light
 I last beheld through tears ;
And fingers clasp mine own again,
Though o'er their touch the turf has lain,
 All wet with mourners' tears.

Thus thoughts go flashing through the soul,
 To cause the prayer, the sigh ;
 And earth and air and life are changed
 I know not how, or why.
 Some seem of madness, some of mirth,
 And some seem far too sweet for earth,—
 God knoweth how and why.

BEHIND THE VEIL.

"It doth not yet appear what we shall be."—1 St. John iii. 2.

WE know not what we shall be,
 Or what the radiant guise
 In which mortality is clothed
 When wafted to the skies ;
 What rays of fadeless splendour
 May tint that wondrous shore,
 Where trouble's seething stormy waves
 Shall break and fret no more.

O kingdom of the deathless !
 O land that holdeth all
 The best, the brightest of our race !
 The good, the beautiful,
 The gentle, the true-hearted
 For ages past have gone
 To swell thy garner, where the sheaves
 Are gathered one by one.

O kingdom of the sinless,
 Where never stain shall be,
 To soil with its corroding blot
 The cleansed heart's purity !
 What high immortal splendour
 May wrap the raiment white,
 In which thy children meet the blaze
 Of God's eternal light !

O kingdom of the tearless,
Where never grief or care,
Or sigh, or aught that symbols pain,
Shall wound the peaceful air!
The links once lost and broken,
From "love's electric chain,"
Are gathered in one perfect round,
And all restored again.

O land without a sorrow!
O light beyond the sun!
O day that know'st no eventide,
Where all life's cares are done!
Fair house beyond the waters!
Bright home of fadeless flowers!
Within thine arms lie sheltered those
We miss with tears from ours.

We know not what we shall be;
"It doth not yet appear,"
That wondrous garb of glory
The dead in Christ shall wear.
Full oft with eager searchings
Both thought and eyes grow dim;
Yet those who meet on yonder shore
Shall be for aye "like Him."

This book is DUE on the last date stamped below

10m-11,'50 (2555)470

UNIVERSITY OF CALIFORNIA
LOS ANGELES

UC SOUTHERN REGIONAL LIBRARY FACILITY

AA 000 364 538 9

1

